Contingent Wage Slaves

By Bernard Bormitt

A recent article in The Dallas Morning News ominously entitled “The End Of The Office” described the fragmentation of office work by hiring contract workers, a trend that is as worrisome for unemployed computer hackers as it is for the industrial and manufacturing sectors companies and corporations that have depended upon contract workers for all sorts of tasks, a practice long an irritant to unionized workers who regard them as a potential weapon in labor disputes. Indeed, in the 18th and 19th centuries, manufacturers regularly sought people in the agricultural sectors of capitalism and preyed upon their poverty and vulnerability in order to maximize profits by having piecemeal work done for rates below the wages paid to regularly hired workers.

In 1995 an enterprising labor lawyer, Sara Horwitz, observing the growing proliferation of “temps” launched the “Freelancers Union,” an organization that ostensibly provides a so-called ‘safety net’ for unemployed office workers who contract their labor power on short term basis. Medical, dental, disability, and life insurance is provided through the “Union” for over 12,000 New York workers and more than 120,000 nationwide.

One thing the F.U. safety net does not offer is a means to insure freelance workers get paid. Sub-contractors are notoriously ignored by firms when it comes to payment for services rendered. Often businesses that resort to contract workers are themselves marginally close to bankruptcy. According to The Wall Street Journal 77% of workers have not gotten paid at least once and “worst yet, more companies are trying to renegotiate lower prices with freelancers after work was delivered.” WSJ offers advice on how to get paid ultimately recommending suing the company in small claims court.

According to the MIT Sloan School of Management professor Thomas Malone, author of the book The Future of Work is a “growing freelance workforce . . . made up of people who see themselves not as having a single job so much as having several at once.” He bases this on an earlier work by Alvin Toffler who promoted the idea of not working for a single corporation or company but having a “portfolio” of jobs. Workers are supposed to juggle these to make ends meet.

Behind such “happy-face” recommendations of pundits, literary cariassists, capitalist apologists and professorialdopes is a dire warning to workers and labor movement a la front office workers. Freelance labor is possibly by PRC-backed hackers. At risk are secret data, such as passwords, email messages and where key oil deposits may be located. For example, in Nigeria and Angola this information would enable Chinese firms to defeat U.S. competitors in landing oil and gas contracts.

As more nations like China rapidly industrialize, imperialist rivalry becomes more intense and Internet spies become a key factor in competing for world markets, raw materials and cheap labor. Google may have slogans, such as “Don’t be evil.” Brin and Page may proclaim that Google puts “principle before profit.” But Google is certainly eager to profit from contracts with PRC despots, until Google’s “crown jewels” were threatened. These facts show that Google is not different from any other capitalist entity. Under capitalism, profits override human rights, freedom of speech, or any other “principle.” Idealistic slogans from Google and empty “socialist” rhetoric from the PRC cannot change this reality under capitalism.

Principle or Profits—Google’s Dispute With China

By Diane Secor

Google recently reported trading attacks on the Google email accounts of Chinese human rights advocates to Internet hackers in the People’s Republic of China (PRC), one of the most repressive regimes in the world. Associated Press (Jan. 13) reported that Google’s dominant shareholders and co-founders, Sergey Brin and Larry Page, boasted that Google may abandon lucrative commercial ties to the PRC, in order to uphold “free speech” and the right to privacy in Internet communications. Brin and Page announced that this Google policy puts the company in front of people in China, where more, are certainly eager to profit from contracts with PRC despots, until Google’s “crown jewels” were threatened. These facts show that Google is not different from any other capitalist entity. Under capitalism, profits override human rights, freedom of speech, or any other “principle.” Idealistic slogans from Google and empty “socialist” rhetoric from the PRC cannot change this reality under capitalism.

‘Globalism’—U.S.—China Relations a Tangle of Contradictions

By John Hoasser

The China/U.S. relationship is a tangled web of contradictions. The growing antagonism between China and the United States is ironically thwarted by world capitalism’s growing net of financial interdependencies—i.e. “globalism.”

China now holds more than $1 trillion in U.S. assets, mainly U.S. Treasury bonds. These assets represent money borrowed from China by the United States to sustain the growing deficits required (by the U.S.) to defer economic collapse. Despite the precarious dollar value of these holdings, (given the inflation of the U.S. money supply) China cannot simply dump them on the market (thereby lowering their price) . . . because the value of the Yuan is pegged to the dollar. Nor can she afford to jeopardize the solvency of the United States, which is her main export market, by not continuing to buy U.S. assets. Either option would be disastrous for both countries—with serious international repercussions. Capitalism is confronted by a conundrum of its own making.

Capitalism is ever dynamic and dangerous to the last—even in senescence. Whether the growing contradictions between private (or state) ownership of the tools of production and the socialized labor of the working masses, who have nothing to sell but the ever-reduced value of their own labor power, will result in:

1. A global economic collapse, shocking the working classes into accepting its historic revolutionary responsibility.
2. The unthinkable consequence: war, or
3. The establishment of the ultimate police state—already incipient in every-develop (Continued on page 2)

FEMA’s ‘Emergency’ Powers

In the March 2010 newsletter Jim McHugh wrote that Hitler didn’t have the propaganda media efficiency capitalism has today and that capitalism in many ways has developed beyond the need for neo-fascism. True, the TV media is especially effective at propagandizing U.S. workers into believing that totalitarianism is Marxism. But such propaganda also provides evidence of rule-changing fear of the possibility of a genuine Socialist revolution and working-class takeover of production and distribution.

The capitalist class are aware that technological outstripping of labor and outsourcing of American jobs to cheap labor havens is debilitating the working-class living standard. I can remember several years ago that charitable organizations compared statistics revealing that somewhere around 24 million hungry Americans were fed in a single year.

Evidence suggests that the capitalist class doesn’t believe that their system of labor exploitation is eternal. Following are examples of what is planned in the event of systematic collapse:

Without congressional or voter approval, President Executive Order Number 12148 created the Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA). While made to appear as an apparatus to aid in the public in an emergency, it’s budget reveals something more sinister. Research shows that only about 6 percent of FEMA’s budget is used for emergencies. Hidden are vast sums for construction of secret underground bases possibly for civilian control during social unrest. FEMA “emergency” powers include surveillance of citizens, restriction of public liberties and largescale of large groups of Americans.

In Nazi Germany labor conscription ensured authorized control and workers could be treated without government permission. Executive Order Number 11,000 gives FEMA similar power over U.S. laborers. Emergency powers include a national citizen registry, confiscation of railroads, public utilities and the relocation of entire communities. Executive Order Number 11921 permits takeover of the means of production, distribution, wages and the flow of labor.

The ruling-class have been preparing for possible economic collapse for years. Detention facilities stand ready for such an event across America. Most recently Halliburton’s Kellogg Brown and Root subsidiary received a $385 million contract to build U.S. detention camps.

In the event of social collapse, something equivalent to Dr Leon’s industrial feudalism is likely being set in place and I agree with Jim McHugh that we may be living in “dangerous times”. We must never become complacent enough to believe that authoritarianism can’t happen in America. Actually such ruling-class reactionaries are encouraged to revolutionaries, for history reveals that ruling-class arrogance is a primary ingredient for development of a revolutionary environment. Formation of a national Socialist Emergency Union could eventually arise out of necessity to counter such ruling-class arrogance.

Some ‘Common Sense’ For the 21st Century

I recently read some critical articles on the economy on the net and could not help wondering how such writers can endlessly circle a problem without ever seeing its capitalistic center. It seems beyond their comprehension that society could be reorganized along lines of cooperative production for need and use, rather than profit. But if this thin membrane concealing the obvious is ever pierced, I believe society will be awash in the floodwaters of revolution.

Students of the SLP are not limited in this way, but our challenge is greater. How can we dissolve this invisible barrier that both imprisons and blinds the working class?

We stand in the shadow of capitalism’s decline. The destruction of both of population and the survival of planetary life are eclipsed and trampled upon by a desperate ruling class gone mad in its rush for profit.

We know the difficulties we face, but if we cannot at least maintain the intellectual spark, which we hold in trust for humanity, we are failing the martyrs of our socialist past, the future of our children’s children and the planet upon which we and our people, nor the world, can afford.

Our weakness as a party is overcome by the strength of the idea we hold. Its power and logic lives in our literature. It is the key that can unlock the mind of the working class, abolish the wages system and change history.

The SLP has flowed and ebbed over its long history; but we too are now in crisis, and when old strategies no longer effective we must discover new ones.

Could we not extract the socialist meat from our best literature, pamphlet by pamphlet, subset by subset, (making out-date references to forgotten people, incidents of the 1940’s, etc.) and bring those principles to bear on the present in a comprehensive and cohesive form?

Gathering the information would require a sustained, but not overwhelming effort. This material could then be organized fairly easily under headings to facilitate its incorporation into the text.

The most pertinent parts of our literature would then be consolidated in a cogent and logical manner, culminating in the SIU concept and incorporated into an attractive booklet or over-size pamphlet—a sort of 21st century version of Tom Paine’s Common Sense.

Such a book could be self-published inexpensively on the net by Blurb.com and printed for delivery on order as needed. It could also appear digitally on our website; with hard copies in select bookstores.

Successfully accomplishing such a project would require psychological insight and skillful writing. I doubt that a committee could do this effectively but if it might succeed such a collaborative effort with the assistance of an SLP advisory board. Not an easy task altogether, but worth the effort, I believe—and we have the talent.

Haiti’s ‘Humanitarian’ Reconstruction

In Comrade Bernard Bortnick’s excellent article in the Feb. 2010 Newsletter, he demonstrates conclusively, as he stated, that “the quest for imperialist profits in the Caribbean trumps all consideration for human life.” Ken Boyte (www.allvoices.com) published two articles, with additional facts, which support Comrade Bortnick’s premise: “Garment Industry: Target for New Labor” and “Multinationals Eye Haiti’s Oil, Natural Resources.”

Is the profit motive, in the quest for markets, cheap labor and raw materials, the real driving force behind these “humanitarian” campaigns under capitalism? President Obama paraded former U.S. Presidents Bill Clinton and George W. Bush as paragons of virtue in organizing fund-raising for “humanitarian relief” for Haiti’s earthquake victims, with the Clinton Bush Haiti Fund. [1] In addition to what Comrade Bortnick wrote about the history of U.S. and European military intervention in Haiti, Obama also sent the U.S. Marines to Haiti, ostensibly to coordinate this “humanitarian relief” after this earthquake last January. But, according to the first Boyte article, Haiti is among the countries with the cheapest labor in the world, which has lured the Soros Development Fund.[2] Reportedly, as U.S. Special Envoy to Haiti, Clinton has been courted by financial community groups, the Haitian Mevs clan’s WINS conglomerate, and foreign textile and agricultural firms to exploit Haiti’s pool of cheap labor for infrastructure projects. Halliburton, Black & Decker, Strauss, and American Eagle Outfitters were among many corporations represented at a Clinton and Inter-American Development Bank-led conference in Port-au-Prince for investment last February. opened or developing capitalist country—is unanswerable. But we do know that Democratic, Industrial Socialism, as ultimately determined by the working class, is the solution. As we struggle to understand and analyze changing events in today’s world, we can work with how to strengthen and improve our outreach. The solution is useless without the working class and the working class is helpless without the solution. Our task is to unite these two elements into one overpowering force. The question is not IF? but how?

. . . Wage Slaves

nothing more than disinguished unemployed. Workers who are forced to work in office staffs, companies resort to the increased productivity that reduced staffs afford who are in turn pressured to take up the slack. To look for rehiring those bumped into the street is not easy although they can be exploited in the “cottage-office” capacity reminiscent of practices in the distant past. Capitalists like a large army of unemployed available to pressure and virtually crack the whip over those that are still employed. Only overturning the whole system and establishing production for use and democratic control of industry and office as advocated by the SLP can open up the promising vistas of future work and life.
